

01 OVERVIEW

radar

THE MONTHLY NEWSLETTER

Naming and designing the identity for Growfin's monthly customer newsletter.

| CLIENT  | ROLE                     | FORMAT                    | STATUS                            |
|---------|--------------------------|---------------------------|-----------------------------------|
| Growfin | Naming & Visual Identity | Monthly Newsletter Header | Concept, developed with marketing |

02 BRIEF

A product update is information. A newsletter should feel like care.

Growfin needed an identity for its monthly customer newsletter, something that could carry product updates, feature launches, and platform news to customers on a recurring basis. Working with marketing, I took this on as a naming and visual identity project: come up with a name and a design system that felt distinct from a typical "here's what's new" product email.

03 NAMING

A name doing three jobs at once

The name Radar carries two meanings at once. From Growfin's side, every customer is on our radar, we're always listening, improving, and responding to their needs. From the customer's side, they stay on top of every pulse of product movement through us, feature launches, platform updates, the things that matter to them.

The name was chosen to reposition the newsletter's whole premise. Not "Growfin telling you what's new," but Growfin including you in what it's building.

DOUBLE MEANING

Two-Way Awareness

- Growfin's side: every customer stays on our radar
- Customer's side: every update stays on theirs

HIDDEN DETAILS

Built-In Wordplay

- Contains "AR", the industry Growfin serves
- Radar is a palindrome, reads the same both ways

04 PROCESS

Sketching the mark before touching a screen

Early exploration worked through the radar mark and wordmark lockup by hand first, testing how a radar-and-ship motif could sit alongside the Growfin logo and the "RadAR" wordplay before any of it moved to screen.

05 DESIGN RATIONALE

Simplicity with intent, not decoration

The Metaphor

The brief to myself was simplicity with intent. No dollar signs, no currency iconography, none of the generic financial visual shorthand a receivables product could easily lean on. The newsletter isn't meant to feel like a product update, it's meant to feel like care.

That led to the central metaphor: a radar system on a ship. The concentric rings represent continuous monitoring. The soft beam sweeping across the design represents focus and active attention. The small geometric shapes orbiting within the rings represent customers themselves, each one accounted for, none left outside the range.

The Constraint

Newsletter banners live inside email, where heavy gradients and complex compositions degrade fast depending on the client rendering them. Keeping the palette restrained and the shapes simple protected the image quality across email clients, so the identity looks as crisp on open as it does in the design file.

The palette stays within Growfin's existing blues. The wordmark is bold and lowercase, chosen to feel approachable rather than corporate, "radar" as something friendly and assured rather than technical or clinical.

"Find the idea that does double duty, name and metaphor doing the same job as the strategy, then design it down to the simplest form that still carries all of it."

06 THE BANNER

Where the naming and the metaphor land

The finished header carries the full idea in one view: the radar rings, the sweeping beam, the orbiting customer shapes, and the lowercase wordmark, all in Growfin's own blues, built to stay crisp inside an inbox.

WHY THIS PROJECT

Radar is a small project next to some of the systems-level work elsewhere in this portfolio, but it's a clean example of naming and visual identity built from the same instinct: find the idea that does double duty, name and metaphor doing the same job as the strategy, then design it down to the simplest form that still carries all of it.